The Hayden isn't just part of history — it helped make it. As the first headquarters of the National Football League, this building was once the nerve center for a sport that would capture America's imagination. Today, the same walls that witnessed the birth of a national pastime now offer modern office spaces with timeless character. High ceilings, abundant light, and a central downtown location create an inspiring environment where great ideas still take root.

Working at the Hayden means being part of a legacy — and shaping what comes next.

First Office Building of the National Football League, 1927-1939

When Columbus native Joe F. Carr was elected the second president of the American Professional Football Association (APFA) in 1921, one of the first items of league business he addressed was establishing the league's headquarters in his hometown. The following year, the team owners and Carr renamed the league the National Football League (NFL).

Carr set up the league's headquarters in the office building located on the eleventh floor of 16 East Broad. The NFL offices were located in rooms 1115-1116 in the New Hayden Building. According to the Columbus City Directories, the NFL's headquarters was listed there from 1927 until 1939.

At the time, the NFL had just two full-time employees in the league office. Accompanying Carr was his secretary, Kathleen Rubadue — the first woman to work for the NFL. In 1939, Carr passed away from a heart attack at the age of fifty-nine.

Because of Joe Carr's leadership and dedication to the NFL from his hometown of Columbus, 16 East Broad Street is recognized as the First Office Building of the National Football League.
